

This building on the northwest corner of West Avenue and Hammond Street was called the Flat Iron Building because of its triangular shape. It was built in 1914 by Mr. Greenfield, the owner of the Greenfield Hotel, from the profits he made from the 1913 firemen's convention. That must have been a lot of beer.

A 2005 picture of the site of the former Flat Iron Building, now occupied by a Food Mart.

This large building on the northwest corner of West Avenue and Main Street was one of Patchogue's oldest houses. It was built in the 1830's by Jonathan Beers. James Ketcham had a tavern and post office here in 1840, and in the following years this building became a hotel under several different owners and names. The last owner was Mr. Greenfield. In later years this building became an apartment house that slowly deteriorated and it was demolished in the 1980's.