

Main Street looking West, Patchogue, L. I.

West Main Street in the year 1914. The large building on the right is the Syndicate Building, which is now called the Wedgewood Building. The small white structure between the two large buildings is the White House Hotel, which was removed in the early 1920's and in 1925 this spot became the site of the future Patchogue Bank.

West Main Street in 1950. Next to the Swezey and Newins store stands the former Bartlett's Saloon and Restaurant, soon to be torn down and the space incorporated to the Swezey store. The large Syndicate building, or Wedgewood Building as it is now called, still has the original upper floor. The last large brick building is the Masonic Temple, which was destroyed later by a fire.

The Wedgewood Building on West Main Street in 1968. On September 10, 1967, a fire destroyed the upper floor, and metal construction was used to replace the original masonry facade.
