The Hunt

It is a little early for furs but F.W. Miller had a run on them last Monday. A large minx sprang through the grating of Charles E. Rose & Son's cellar, having entered from the yard in the rear and ran into Mr. Miller's store. The sudden appearance of the animal seemed to make him appear of mammoth proportions for there was a lively scrambling to get out of the way. Proprietor Miller seized a broom and danced along the show cases so lightly that he did not break a glass. Miss Parks took to the street. Mr. Dickerson knocked his head against the wall in trying to jump out of the way. Reinforcements came to the rescue. John Roe fell into a pile of derby hats. John Dare tried to shoo the animal with a pair of boots. Gunther Rose, always up-to-date, made a desperate attempt to entrap the poor fellow with a pair of bloomers. Jack Reid attempted to charm the animal by whistling. This called in Wilmot Gerard's celebrated hunting hound and his master, and the circus ended with the death of the minx.

Great excitement in the store: the hunt for wild furry critters.

CHAS. E. ROSE & SON.

The prices of goods look fantastic to today's shoppers, but on an weekly workers wage of between life to eight dollars, the prices are not any better in comparison.
